

---

Subject: : Paflyfish General Forum

Topic: : Nymphing

Re: Nymphing

Author: : SBecker

Date: : 2013/2/25 15:34:15

URL:

A buddy taught me how to get my flies to sink like rocks when using an indicator. When fishing an indicator your flies are being immediately pulled down stream and do not sink very quickly. Depending on what part of the water column you are fishing it might work for you. However, when you want your nymphs directly on the bottom ticking this is what you do.....

Cast out like normal.

Strip out extra line and shake it onto the water.

Then roll cast that line that you just stripped out above your indicator.

If you do it perfectly you will lift the indicator out of the water a little and this will instantly sink your flies.

Your floating line will be behind your indicator.

This will give you in most situations a drag free drift and put your flies on the bottom.

You can keep stripping out line and roll casting it out. These times you will not pick up your indicator out of the water.

Doing this will be like dirty pinning with a fly rod.

I hope I described that ok. I just recently learned this tip up on the Delaware and was able to get a drag free drift for a long ways down some seems. My flies would hit the bottom and get snagged in places that they were not before, because my indicator was pulling them downstream and not allowing them to hit bottom.

Hope this helps somebody on here. It sure helped me.