There is a vast difference between "ownership" and "stewardship". When we are born we come into this world owning nothing and we exit the same way, however we do become stewards of everything around us. How actively we pursue this stewardship and the amount of effort we put towards it is directly proportionate to the well being of the object/s in our care. By assigning that stewardship responsibility to others, we must therefore be willing to accept the direction that it takes (which I think RLeeP has stated).

Since we are ultimately responsible for assigning stewardship responsibilities, we must also share the responsibility of the stewardship results.
