There is no one answer to your question. I seldom use anything other than a 4 weight for trout, unless it's a windy day on a big stream. A 5 weight is also a good choice for trout or bass, if you get a fast rod. You'll need the speed for casting weighted flies long distances, and fighting big fish in big water.

For salt water I have a 9 weight 9 foot, which doubles for a salmon rod, unless you're talking land locked salmon in Maine, then a 4 or a 5 weight is sufficient. For big bass water a 6 weight is plenty as long as it a fairly fast rod, I mostly use a 4 wt. and that's fine for bass as long as it's not windy. It's a complicated issue especially when you ask on a message board, where you'll find dozens of answers.
