I agree that whether it is a smoking day or not depends on the time of year, the resource, and what you typically expect from a body of water based on past experience. I might get 80 fish on a small river with wild trout that does not get a lot of fishing pressure, however most of the fish would be small to mediums. On highly pressured public waters in the Winter, any day in the double digits might be a really good day. On the main stem of some rivers that tend to produce a few big trout, a day in the double digits is tremendous day. Then there are the few trips that only come once in a long time where you have a stupendous day beyond all expectations. Those are the trips you will always remember and it is even better if you get to share it with one of your fishing buds.
