Breaking down the variables (sunk, floating, flouro, mono, stiff, soft, 5X, 6X, etc.) the most important contributor to success will be to reposition myself in relation to the target to get "better" drifts. It is almost certain that for any given drift, the same tippet will be more visible than on other drifts irrespective of brand. On one drift the sun catches it just right and the thing sparkles. On a slightly different drift from another angle it may be barely visible. Whether that makes a difference in addition to less drag after you reposition, no one knows for sure.
