After the post made about how many fish people catch on average got me thinking..

Don't over think this.

I personally thought much of that thread was baloney. I've fly fished hard for over thirty years for trout and I've never had an honest 100 fish day (even back when I fished 8 hour days and counted fish). Not even close. The numbers people were describing were way off the charts and nothing close to routine. Good days can certainly be measured in a handful of fish. I consider double digits on most of the streams I fish to be very good numbers for me. Don't let numbers cloud your enjoyment of fishing.

(I know, I know.....some of you will respond about your 100 fish days and 1000 fish seasons etc. I'm not denying this. My point is simply to describe to a beginner what is typical and to emphasize that even experienced fly fishers don't always chalk up these numbers. I'm just speaking for myself. Your numbers are your numbers)
