in terms of toughness, how would you rate the letort compared to spring creek in state college?

I fish both these waters pretty extensively and regard Letort as much tougher than Spring Creek.

There are - of course - all manner of ways in which a stream is "tough." The Letort is much more difficult physically; the ground is soft, grass is tall, water is slow and weedy and fish lay low under cover. In Spring Creek, by contrast, you can wade on the hard bottom and it's an easy nymph stream wih runs and current Spring also seems to have a lot more surface activity. Fish will hold a station near the surface and you can present to them. I find these aspects much less common on Letort. With respect to the actual selectivity of the fish, I think they're about the same. I suspect Spring Creek fish see a lot more flies over the course of a season and may be a bit more selective.

But to actually catch fish - Letort is much tougher.
