Yeah, it was Harvey. I'll have to dig it up this evening, but the story appeared in his book "memories, patterns, and tactics". My recollection could be off, but what I'm recalling was Japanese beetles from a trap. Gluing different size and length of tippet, twine, etc on there, and tossing them into Spring Creek to see what would happen. And the answer was that they were eaten just the same nomatter what was attached.

Lots of things float overhead. They pick out bugs from floating masses of grasses and so forth. Fish simply aren't spooked by tippet, so long as it's moving naturally with the current. But pressured fish especially, if anything looks to be floating UNNATURALLY, it's a problem.
