Phillip Tome talks about catching trout in a weir just below Slate Run in the 1790's in July in his book; "Pioneer Life; Thirsty Years a Hunter." He told some tales in his book, but I believe that in this case it was true. He also mentioned Susquehanna Salmon, which today are walleyes but back then there were no walleyes in the Susquehanna drainage so they had to be either big trout or shad.

There are a lot of times back in the old days they used trout and salmon somewhat interchangeably, but not always. I always wondered how there is a Salmon Creek in the NF when there was never a salmon native to PA?
