I've never had much luck with the early stonefly imitations, but I've heard many people say they do well with imitations of the little early stoneflies this time of year.

So, he may be have been completely sincere about using that fly pattern.

Regarding streamside vegetation management, there are many different (but sincerely held) differences about that, too.

Some people think all non-native vegetation should be removed. Other people think vigorous vegetation is good for the stream, whether non-native or native, so it's best to not cut it.
