Nick,

I think Fade was using the chainsaw to cut vines hanging from trees as part of a volunteer effort sponsored by VFTU. There is value value in that because they will eventually kill mature trees near streams. Saving a mature tree is much more valuable than the planting new ones. (on the short term) And still you would have to maintain the new plantings.

I don't see any reason why trimming back brush away from the immediate stream side is damaging. Even along streams the root systems carry substantial value whether native or invasive.

Multifloral rose thrives on the woodlot edges. If you are caught in a bramble, back up and go deeper into the woods and you will likely be around it in no time. It doesn't like shade.
