I'd highly recommend a landing net (although you should be able to get something very nice and functional for under $80).

Personally, I don't care for the shallow bag "catch and release" nets. I usually use my net if I want to photograph a fish and prefer a deep, soft mesh bag. This deep bag will allow you to keep the fish submerged while you fiddle with a camera or wait for a buddy to get down and join you. C&R nets aren't well suited for this as the fish can flip out. The big clear mesh type bags have become very popular in recent years and don't get hooks tangled in them as much.

Just my 2 cents on the topic.
