A dam upstream of Coburn backs water up for a pretty good distance. During summer water flows very slowly through the impoundment. I've always been curious about how the slowing of water at that dam affected water temperatures downstream, so last year I took temperatures below the dam and in the more free flowing water above the impoundment. The time was late July and though I didn't write down the temperatures I believe they were the same. I was really surprised by this. Hook Jaw is local, maybe he can do some additional temperature readings sometime.
