Yeah, seeing small patterns, especially in broken water, is tough. Can try the adams thing. You can also shift positions, often a slight change in angle gives you a better view with glare situations and such. If you aren't already, polarized sunglasses help with this as well.

Otherwise it's mostly about getting a better feeling for where your fly is at. When you can know more exactly, the window you are focusing on gets smaller, and the number of rises in that window isn't quite as frequent. That comes with practice. I prescribe for you to spend much more time on these fish that rise so consistently!!!!
