I don't want anything that might serve to organize my tying tools and accessories and give me a more clear idea of where things are.

If I can't find something, I buy another one or go without.

If you do it this way, you will eventually end up with enough tools that you'll always be able to find at least one of what you are looking for. I call it The Saturation Method. At any given time, I have: 3-8 pair of scissors, 2-7 pair of hackle pliers, 3-5 bodkins, 2-3 .22 caliber bore brush attachments (for picking out dubbed bodies) and 10-30 of those little fused mono loops they sell for flossing under dental work (for threading bobbins), all on my tying table even though most of them may be underneath a clump of marabou or an India neck at any given time..

Additionally, this is a good way to discover what tools you never needed in the first place. For me, this included things like a hair stacker and a whip finisher. I bought them and then I lost them and then discovered it didn't matter because I never needed them anyway. So, losing tools is also a good way to save money in addition to ensuring you always have new, sharp scissors, etc.

The Saturation Method also works with toothbrushes, BTW.

Good Luck with your idea though...
