Yeah, I have no issue with it. If it became an every weekend thing I might say enough is enough. But as it is, it's fine.

That's not to say I have any interest in competing, just willing to accept that others are allowed to have different opinions than my own. And like others, I'm interested in keeping tabs on the latest and greatest techniques. From a healthy distance, of course. I can choose to use them or not use them at my discretion. I'm out for pleasure, and my measurement of success may be very different than the way the point system is set up. But more techniques, combined with hard data on their effects, is always a good thing.

They hurt noone. They don't exclude the public, and that competitor has as much right to fish as I do. No more, no less. If he wishes to do his fishing in a competition format, good for him.

I assume it's kind of like a marathon. Sure, plenty people run just for fun. But most in a "competition" format such as a marathon don't have any intent on winning that marathon. Competing against themselves, and seeing how they stack up. Only a few actually have eyes on winning the thing.
