shakey calls it.

as to value, it has potentially more if its a rare leonard and the Japanese decide its collector worthy, other than that it'll never have teh same cachet as if it was done by Hiram, Payne or one of the other rodmakers.

you should try fishing it, it might actually be terrible because it is a spin/fly, after all, which are generally compromised designs.

at that point then you might as well stick it back in the closet and hope on the far east fetishizing it, or tearing it down for the raw Phillipson blank which would, frankly, be a terrible thing to do.
