Superficially, combining agencies seems good. Fur, fins, feathers, hey, its all good, right? I taught in the Warren Co. School district for 5 years and learned that when you combine something even as cooperative as neighboring school districts, upper-level positions grow. You get so many coordinators and new departments and collaborative organizational heads that, BTW, all make way bigger bucks than Conservation Officers make, who actually do stuff. This isn't like we are folding one game commission into another, we are merging 2, one fish, one fur & fowl. I'm not against it, but through my experience, I'd need to see something solid to be for it.
