Depends on how it's implemented.

You can do this, and save some money by only having to keep one set of payroll books, only having 1 web manager, eliminating procedural redundancies, etc. Essentially half the management without shrinking the working side of things. And if they go this route, then you should get better service for less. This would be GOOD.

But too often, it goes the other way. And they think they can get away with half the officers, studies, etc. And if you do this, less people have more work to cover. The necessary result is a decrease in service.
