Have to agree with RLee on this one.

When Cabelas and Bass Pro began putting retail stores all over the country a decade or so ago, I thought then that they would exhaust the market. How many rods, reels guns, waders, etc, can they really sell on a steady basis?

With the stores relatively close together, there are only so many people to reach, and even fewer that have the means to continually shop there.

They will eventually contract, and many jobs will be lost.

Also agree to support the local shops and Poor Richards really packs in a lot of gear in a small amount of space. Cabelas could never compete with them for steelhead gear.
