I have hatch charts, books with hatch info in them that I keep track of for what's going on at any one time. But time on the water is the best place, short of that charts and the local fly shop are good places to start. As you begin fishing a few streams season after season you'll get familiar with what's hatching when on them. Then as time goes on believe it or not you'll suddenly realize that you're no longer wondering what bugs are out when and what size they are you're mental chart of hatches will begin to fill in. The charts, and your local fly shop are a good place to get an idea of what size and color flies to go with as well.
