I love Adams flies with really bright posts to fish at maximum range for brookies. But in bright sun, or on streams that only allow such short casts that I don't really need all of the superbright posts, I may trim them back a bit.

Still, visibility is great in dry flies, it is good to fish dries at distance w/o leader drag, imho.. Getting visibility can be tricky: even a small stream can have a nice pool you don't expect where you can cast 35+ ft and you want to see that fly..

Difference could also have been the size / shape of the flies, not just the color? Bigger flies may have helped in this pool?
