
Subject: : Warm Water & Salt Water Fly-Fishing

Topic: : Largies on the fly

Re: Largies on the fly

Author: : afishinado

Date: : 2013/4/7 10:01:27

URL:

Quote:

guppieguy wrote:

so, if/when i commit to WW fly fishing for bass, i should have a sink tip/fully sinking line with straight 15lb fluoro, and another spool with floating WF line tapered from.... 20 mono/fluoro to 12? like 20/15/12 on the end? maybe it would be easier to buy a tapered 0x leader.....

*EDIT: wait shouldn't the taper be on the sinking line to help turn over the larger streamers used? and straight for surface poppers/divers?

Keep it simple. I fish quite a bit for LM on lakes and have helped many to get started FFing.

Get yourself a floating WF line in the proper weight and attach a tapered leader to properly turnover your leader and cast with some accuracy. A store-bought 0x leader 7 1/2' would work fine with a short tippet of the same diameter. That set-up will work well to turn over surface and shallow running flies.

If you want to fish a little deeper, in place of your tapered leader, you can attach a 7-10' poly leader to the end of your floating line. The poly leader is simply a tapered sink-tip with a 3-4' tippet of 14lb or + straight mono. That would work as your deep rig.

No need to buy other lines and spools and tapers and rigs.... 🙄

The above rigs would cost