I took a trip to the Little J today with hopes of hitting the tail end of the Olives. The weather was a nice 60 degrees, and the flows were pushing around 400 cfs. The day started off pretty bright and sunny, and I did not see any surface activity, until after noon. I nymphed the morning, and did well with a walts worm followed by a pheasant tail. I was targeting the slack water along the edges, and the fish were hitting the flies pretty hard. I took a very healthy 15 inch wild brown on the walts worm, along with several smaller fish nymphing.

I noticed the olives coming off sparatically around noon, and I found a nice side chanel that had several rising fish. I took four on a parachute biot body emerger, including the fish of the day, which was a very strong 16 inch brown. Overall, it was a great day. the flows seemed small at 400 cfs, but I was worn out after wading all day. The fish in the Little J are quite impressive, as well. It reminds me a lot of Penns, with those regards.

On a side note, I caught a brownie with a clipped adipose fin. I cannot remember, does that demark a wild or stocked fingerling. My common sense says, stocked fingerling, but I know they recently did that large survey on the wild trout in there, and I am unsure if they clipped them then.
