In the past month I'm still continuing to see a lot of stoneflies. Although I can't say I've paid particularly close attention to this....it does indeed seem to me that they have been heavier and have continued longer this year than I can ever remember. A few nights ago, while bass fishing, I half expected to see caddis but the stones were still coming off and trout were still feeding on 'em. I'm wondering if the cold conditions and stable water levels we've seen this spring may have had something to do with this(?). To be sure, most of them I'm seeing are on warm water creeks and rivers, but they are still on trout streams around here too - and lots of 'em.

What have you been seeing? Does it seem like this has been a very good year for early stoneflies in your neck of the woods?
