Trap netting revealed that tiger muskies are both numerous and in the shallows at the moment. Nets were set on the south side of the lake for about 2/3 of the lake's east-west length. All had tigers and all were set from within about 10 ft of the shoreline. I don't think there was anything special about the south side for muskies.....the crew was actually netting for walleye, which spawn on the south side.
This muskellunge and tiger muskellunge pattern...occupying the shallows...should be true statewide at present.
