The fact of the matter is that today we must anticipate extremes in weather. It's simply the way that it is and will continue to be. I often think that much of it is media hype but when we look at "averages" few things are "average" anymore. Look at 2011 when we were at a few days from declaring emergency drought levels (which historically we do every Summer in PA) almost 30 days early, then we are hammered with catastrophic rains. I was speaking with one of the WGAL meteorologists last week who is a forensics guy on climatology last week and the data is empirically sound. Variance is what we should expect.
