right more natgas and less coal, so less acidic rain over time. but of course any transition will be gradual and there's also AMD in some streams in schuylkill, luzerne, carbon.

if some non-AMD streams get more browns, some AMD streams may get more brookies. some of the AMD streams get water from mine tunnels and have very cold water all year. along with acidity issues, they might be better for brookies than browns just on a water-temp basis.

I can think of an AMD stream or two that had more brookies than I expected.
