Mike, of course most of us have used flies that we tied that were not proportionally right. It is part of the learning curve when we are becoming better tyers. We do not sell them to people though. Yes...they will catch fish. However, you are testing them on stocked pellet heads. I would say the body proportions are your bigger problem and not the tails as much.

In regards to the repeat satisfied customers.....that is fine and dandy, but the point is to grow a business. Not keep selling to the ones that are not knowledgeable about tying and what nymphs are supposed to look like.

Edit: Now why did you go and delete your whole comment? I was trying to have a nice conversation with you.
