Stagger, in my own experience which is relatively limited in light of dry flys ive found that when presenting a fly my drift also seems fine. If my memory serves me Pcray brought up the idea of "microdrag" which must make that fly look different enough from the naturals to detur the trout from your fly. A bad practice I used to have was presenting the fly over a fish, and if I wasnt happy with it I would rip the fly back and really disturb the water. Worst thing about this was it was all done in front of the fish I was casting to, most likely spooking it. I think with a proper drag free drift the color and size can be a little less exact.
