It has been my experience that anglers have nearly always underrated the fish population based on their catches, but electrofishing has told a different story. This is why you can't tell what and what isn't a Class A population with a "whippy-stick."

I'd agree that angler catch rates are a poor indicator of a stream population. However, you can confirm that a stream is a Class A with a "whippy-stick" if you catch enough fish. What you cannot do is confirm that a stream is NOT a Class A, because you have no idea how many fish you miss.
