Squatch,

An overgrazed horsemeadow is not natural and beyond poor conservation practice. At one point I don't think there was a single blade of grass in that field. That may have been a couple years ago.

I caught my first native out of that stream. That was over 30 years ago! I do understand the geology of the area, but know it was much cleaner back then. There were times when it actually had the "bright" look of a brookie stream. Seems now the levels fluctuate very rapidly and retain a silty appearance long after the rains are gone.

We did some biomass samplings on the stream years ago and the diversity of aquatic life was outstanding for a freestoner. I wonder how much it has changed?

I guess I just wish the conservation groups could focus more on saving what is special and to me that means starting in the headwaters.
