I noticed on the class a streams that some say they on private property but open to fish does this mean I need special permission? ...also I tried the yough once and felt pretty hopeless.

The Class A list has much info that is dated. Some of the streams have not been surveyed in many years. If they were "open" they allowed fishing at the time of the survey but it may be that you needed actual permission from the landowner. My advice is get a list of wild streams on public land and start by exploring those. The ones on private land, I would visit and if the land is posted, you should ask permission. If it isn't posted, depending on the appearance, I might consider walking in and fishing - it's a judgement call but it never hurts to ask (and this may even get you permission to fish waters that aren't on the list or otherwise posted). Folks are often tight lipped about exact spots to access particular wild trout streams. A polite PM to a forum member from that neck of the woods would be more likely to get you some specific info.

The Yough is tough and often treats newbies rough. Don't give up on it.

The Savage River in MD is also world class and - I think - more predictable than the Yough (but can also be tough to fish). The special reg section of the Yough in MD is also very good and worth a visit.
