The largest I've ever come across was 12 1/2". A fair number in the 10-11" range, but it does seem to top out around there.

Again, freestone only, and not counting obvious situations where they grew large in a lake or large river. If you're stated goal is to target large wild brookies, it can be done. It's just that most people who chase brookies are really looking for the "brookie experience" more than the fish themselves. That includes the remote locations, often a hike to get there, small forested mountain streams, etc. And these kind of fish are truly rare under those circumstances.
