Yeah there are a lot of folks who feel the same way. I personally don't make it a habit to harvest wild fish (especially natives), but I have been known to do it from time to time-especially when camping.

It's interesting to think about though. There are some who lose sleep over the idea that a wild trout might have died at the hands of an angler. I can't help but wonder how they feel in this situation.

Midnight, I tend to think you're right. It probably doesn't help the situation. It certainly won't hurt though (assuming the angler recognizes the difference between a brown and brook trout! LOOK AT THE SIGNS!), and its a tasty contribution I for one am willing to make.
