PennKev,

I disagree with the pectoral fin, it looks pretty clean on close inspection. The camera doesn't do it justice, but what you are seeing I think are color variations and reflection rather than a ragged edge. With the picture, the best fin shot is of the anal fin, which is clean. Also, sharp distinction between black and white on the fins, which is often a good indicator of wild.

I disagree. I clicked on the image to get a larger view and I still see a short, stubby, worn fin with a kink in the leading edge. That's been enough in other threads to deem fish stocked.
