Osprey .. in my short experience I have found that going to a creek with a nice population of bluegills and such is great for 'practice'.

The big difference compared to a pond is you can 'practice' in the natural surroundings similar to other trout creeks. For me it is a blast C & R'ing tons of fish (which doesn't happen for me when fishing for trout) but I also get to concentrate/learn on my surroundings (example) water movement, being cautious of trees behind me as not to get hung up, forced to use different casting methods, etc .. to go along what you listed
