Regarding weather, I was playin around with picto-graph forecasts above. Took a closer look yesterday evening of the actual models. Still too early to put much faith in the forecast for next weekend. But we're getting into relatively solid range for the lead up, which can give you an idea of stream conditions at the start.

Lots of rain today through Saturday. Some rain/storms today, showers still around tomorrow, and then it looks like a deluge Friday night through Saturday morning. Massive green blob, steady rain. Another bout late Saturday. Could easily be 3+ inches total from now until early Sunday. Sometime early on Sunday, the last will pass, and from then through Wednesday at least we'll have high pressure and bluebird skies.

Picture massive blowout this weekend with 4 or so dry days to recover before jammers begin to arrive late next week.

From there the uncertainty begins. Next system rolls in late next week. But no model agreement on details. How wet is it? Will it be scattered storms or a big green blob? Where's it goin, who gets what? Just too early to know. It could blow things out again, or be virtually nothing but some clouds.
