I generally avoid discussions as the one generated here. I respect all opinions expressed as I believe we all should. I must, however, address the opinion that supports Beaver's operations and Harmon's as being the same. To this, I ask the question: While it is true that real blood and the substance used to simulate blood (in movies, the theater, etc.) are the same color, does that, in and of itself, make them the same? It would seem that more depth of thought would reveal that there are substantial differences between the two. I believe that an analysis and subsequent comparison of these two operations would take one deeper than the broad, very general surface comparison of two business models operating a fish-for-pay operation. That's like saying the street vendor's stand in Philadelphia and the finest restaurant in all of Paris, France, are all the same. Using only the broadest, most general surface comparison, they are; but, how many of us would stop our comparison there?
