First and probably most important, don't trust any gear you didn't set up yourself. I had some line out, apparently more than ever before, when I noticed the fly line was tied in a knot around the arbor. After looking at the backing a little closer, I realized it was mono (and like I said before, not attached to the line anyway).

2nd, I was moving to a different spot, and let the line go behind me in the current for a second. I got where I was going, went to cast, and launched a small rock bass past my head. I didn't feel it on the line at all. So I guess I need to keep an eye on my fly, or just make sure there are no fish already on there before I cast.
