Good point, I have always been taught to wiggle the rod tip to give the nymph some lively hood.

I never thought to look till you brought that up, but I found this video:

And by paying attention to what is floating around the nymphs during the whole emergence stage, you're right. I had never though of that beyond the "wiggle." Watching those movements is going to have my trying out how to mimic them in the water. I was particularly interested in the emergence stage and the spinner stage, notice the ripples on top of the water that would make it stand out against its surroundings.

Good stuff, thanks osprey
