Second, really big hatches can be tricky. If you were on very glassy water and the fish had lots of options odds are your fly wasn't particularly appealing. Finding a fish that is feeding in moving water can be easier. The longer they have to inspect it the less likely they'll take it.

Going on the same lines with the above. I have found that if I get my nippers out and cripple the dry fly I'm using a bit sometimes can make a difference. Be the fish... Think about what they are seeing. All the same stuff just fly'n on past. Sometimes something that is the same but has something wrong with it triggers them. Or at least some of the time.

There have been times during a sulphur hatch that I couldn't buy a thrill, tied an adams on and nailed the slop outta um. Once you start catch'n on dries... Well, it's a rush for me. Can't speak for everyone. Good luck. Keep at it.
