I was underneath virtually all day. But I was fairly limited in patterns I was trying, as I said, blaming my read of water or drift.

I didn't start getting hopeful about a hatch until around 6pm when a few sulphurs started showing up (which promptly stopped 20 minutes later). I actually left FSB frustrated around 5:10 hoping to give Big Spring a shot for the last couple hours of the day. I made it about 8 miles up 81 and turned around, determined to -- as you said -- beat the stream.

Yeah, right.

I just got done writing about being confident about your fishing when approaching challenges on the water. I threw it all out the window the moment I saw that creek for the first time yesterday, and spent the entire afternoon and evening bumbling around like a goddamned idiot.
