While fishing this weekend I noticed that my fly line no longer stays on top of the water in the last couple feet. Some of the guys at the jam said its getting water logged. This makes sense since I trimmed the tip a couple times before I knew it was permeable on the cut end. I got a few tips that involved sealing the end with adhesives and using floatant.

Today my hook pierced my line which I can recall happening several times since I bought it.

Q: Is there a fly line treatmet that permanently seals the outside surface once its been compromised in unknown locations?
