I sort of agree with gfen. Only to a point.

And that point is that you don't have to "use" a line to wear it out. Turning a line around helps a little. But if it was under there, it still got wet, stored in a hot car sometime, maybe saw a little sun, etc. If you know that you absolutely will never use the 2nd half, why have it on the reel at all? It will be "like new" if stored in a dry basement.

But I do think you're barking up the wrong tree thinking that the front 2' is going to make a world of difference, or trying to make a shooting head, etc.

If you are ever gonna use more than half a line, put it all on there. You can turn it around someday and get more life. If you know you never will use the second half, then I'd say there's no problem with cutting it in half, and storing the other half.
