This thread reminded me of the recent thread "Super Aggressive Trout Feeding?" where Osprey and I were talking about putting more life to the fly, any fly really. I did some research specifically for nymphs and came across this video:

It shows the emergence stage quite well. But like Pcray said involving which type of fly is emerging in regards to fishing a nymph on top (cool technique, never thought of that), but there seems to be more to it than that specific method, in regards to how fast you can use an "induced take method" and how you fish a nymph through the water column. However, seems over thinking gets in the way of problem solving.

Very good reading, thank you for the knowledge.
