

Subject: : Gear Talk

Topic: : Which mid level waders?

Re: Which mid level waders?

Author: : gfen

Date: : 2013/6/4 21:50:59

URL:

Quote:

jhedge wrote:

You are correct the majority has said ll bean. I guess that'll be my first stop then. Is it really that easy to walk in and out? Do they have a limit on how old the item is out anything like that?

Yes, it really is that easy.

I had no sales slip, and still left with the current product they sell in under 15 minutes from coming through the door. This includes banter with the sales girl, laughing at the manager's baldness, and waiting for them to pull one off the shelf.

I suspect that if the product was a past generation, it would've been somewhat more involved, but Bean really pushes, and stands by, the original Lifetime Satisfaction guarantee, matter of fact, the bald manager has encouraged me to take advantage of it even when I don't think I would be in the right.

Lifetime means lifetime. Bean means your lifetime, should you choose to take advantage of it.

Cabela's has changed, now its 90 days, or for Cabela's branded clothing, a "lifetime of use." What's that mean? Depends. But I assure you I wouldn't get new waders if I walked in and handed them to them after 2 years.

On the other hand, even if Bean encourages you to use the lifetime commitment, I think there's a point where one's simply being a twat and taking advantage of it, but you're free to make that distinction to yourself. They'll let you do whatever you feel comfortable doing, because that's their thing.

Stop in on a Tuesday night, take advantage of the free fly tying class.