Perhaps it's been a combination of cool weather (at least until recently) and good, stable water flows without many storms that may partially explain things this year(?). More broadly, I've felt for some years that central PA is going through something of a wild trout boom with many streams seeing increased populations of wild trout and improving conditions (generally).

Thoughts?

I agree with all of those factors, along with the fact that the lack of storms has resulted in much more available time to fish the streams for me personally. It's been a very good year.
