

---

Subject: : Warm Water & Salt Water Fly-Fishing

Topic: : Fallfish vs creek chub

Re: Fallfish vs creek chub

Author: : streamerguy

Date: : 2013/6/9 21:41:00

URL:

^lol now we're really getting complicated. I'm not a biologist or anything, but do like catching many different species and love knowing what I caught, even if I have to do a little research when I get home from my trips. So many species, so much to learn. Anywho, here it goes.

Striped shiner- pretty much your second pic. That one is a pretty good sized one and it's in full spawning mode. Most are just silver and a little smaller. <http://www.dnr.state.oh.us/Home/speci...r/tabid/6773/Default.aspx>

Creek chubs- compared to striped shiners, they look more like fall fish. Where I fish, striped shiners are actually more common, but in some of the real small streams creek chubs are present. <http://www.dnr.state.oh.us/Home/speci...b/tabid/6599/Default.aspx>

River chub- can get bigger than creek chubs and are more silver. Scales seem bigger too. The males can get a pretty big head. They're actually pretty good fighters <http://www.dnr.state.oh.us/Home/speci.../tabid/22148/Default.aspx>

Hornyhead chub- smaller than river and creek chubs but they're similar. The mouth is more towards the bottom of the head. I've only caught a few of these. <http://www.dnr.state.oh.us/Home/speci.../tabid/22147/Default.aspx>

All three of those chub species, as well as striped shiners even, can get those "horns" on their heads.

I don't know much about fallfish, they aren't around where I fish.