Thanks JackM for responding to my question without naming any books (I don't think there are any books that talk about fishing ethics anyways). The Coast guard has some guides that deal with boat safety - which may include right away, port/starboard respect lanes, etc. But as you mentioned you taught your kids and some friends and passed on your understanding of ethics in fishing. Which is probably different than my understanding.

I came from a broken family and my dad would beat things into me. Now I live in the city and the creeks are congested with fisherpeople. Since I am so used to seeing others - I may not realize others/my boundries when I am out fishing in the country.

Hookjaw - the fish don't care how a person looks unless the person is standing right in front of them. I wonder if fish laugh when they see all those colors! And then you have all these angler programs on TV where their boats are all decked out with bright colors. They still seam to catch fish.

Remember the Serenity Prayer includes everyone. Do not take it personal when someone accidentally invades your box. Getting all hot under the collar will not help you become a better fisherperson - having more understanding of others will.
